The onset of an immune response in a T cell occurs in three steps. First, T cell receptors recognize a peptide presented by major histocompatibility complex (MHC) molecules on antigen presenting cells (APCs). This recognition event leads to the second step in the reaction, downregulation of the TCR-CD3 complex on the surface of the T cell. Receptor downregulation is required for the T cell to avoid self-reactivity in the face of a vast excess of self peptide-MHC complexes. However, even an MHC-restricted T cell must be able to ignore self-antigens in order to avoid autoimmunity. This third step in the immune response, where the immune system must monitor for small, yet potentially profound fluctuations in the antigen load, is the focus of this proposal. This "spatiotemporal" monitoring of antigen load is hypothesized to be executed through TCR signaling. However, TCR signaling may occur when antigen is ligated to a TCR at a specific time, in a specific location, on a specific T cell type or if there is a surge in peptide/MHC complexes that are recognized but have a low affinity for the TCR. The significance of this proposal is its focus on TCR signal transduction to define the spatiotemporal regulation of the T cell response. The project will use in vitro T cell assays using T cells from mice expressing a TCR that can be induced to downregulate its TCR by ligating it to a known immunogenic peptide. The project will also utilize siRNA to knock down the 50b96ab0b6
